Here the belief is that the intentions of Germany as affecting Morocco are purely to protect her large and growing commercial interests. In other words it is felt that Germany merely stands for the policy of the open door and for the protection of her increasing trade.

A French protectorate either in fact or one tacitly existing would mean that the bulk of such concessions would go to French capital because the existing agreement makes this easily possible. It is pointed out that the German emperor foresees this possible development and that his Moroccan policy is merely designed to place Germany at least on an equality with France in the future development of the country.
